Getting to Zero (G2Z) is a co-innovation grants program established under the Singapore-Australia Green Economy Agreement to drive development, export and trade in low-emissions products and services.

Businesses operating in green industries seeking to innovate products and services face major hurdles, including high set up costs, compliance obligations, and limited access to specialised skills and connections with green supply chains. Through financial support and connections to supply chain networks and technical expertise, the G2Z program will help businesses overcome these hurdles and further advance innovation in low-emissions products and services.

G2Z connects Australian and Singapore businesses to develop, export and trade low-emissions products and services. A joint initiative under the 2002 Singapore-Australia Green Economy Agreement (GEA), the program aims to strengthen green industry collaboration and commercial capability. It will also support both countries' transition to low carbon energy, including for industry.

The program targets co-innovation opportunities across prospective green industry sectors, prioritising renewable and clean energy technologies, critical minerals processing, green metals, and low-carbon liquid fuels.

Opportunities may also extend to sustainable agribusiness and food; the built environment and infrastructure; advanced manufacturing and sustainable materials; waste management and the circular economy; green transportation and logistics; energy-efficient technology and products; environmental monitoring, analysis and assessment; and other products or services aligned with the GEA's objectives.

G2Z supports joint projects between Australian and Singapore-based businesses, with both partners applying to their respective funding agencies for support.

Eligible Australian applicants may receive grants of up to A$500,000 from the Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade under this program. Successful Australian applicants will have up to two years to complete a project.

Singapore-based businesses participating in a joint project may seek funding support through Enterprise Singapore, subject to prevailing eligibility and assessment requirements.
